Abstract:

The article the emergence of eclecticism as a distinct view point in counselling and psychotherapy. Its view of human nature, process, method of counselling were discussed. The article presented a case study using the eclectic counselling approach to show that eclectic counselling is not the mere combination of different counselling approaches in counselling, but an approach which involves scientific thinking concerning the valid and reliable applications of basic science methods and facts to individual case handling.