All societies, be it primitive or modern, often consciously inculcate in its citizenry certain cherished norms and values. The inculcation in the citizenry of these norms and value is considered necessary to prepare them to assume specific roles in the society towards realizing the goals for easy societal organization and maintenance of law and order. In other words, if an individual does not internalize the beliefs, norms and values of the society, his behavioural characteristics and tendencies may violate acceptable standards of behavior in the society. This chapter discusses forms of socialization, agent of socialization, how political culture is formed and the typology of political culture.