Abstract: The study examines the social life and problems of Liberian refugees in a camp. The data from a sample of 162 refugees show that the refugees were relatively young, had high level of education, mostly of the Christian faith and from all the counties and major ethnic groups in Liberia. Although such amenities as electricity, pipe-borne water, sports facilities, school for children and health centre were available in the camp, water supply was irregular while drugs and other essential commodities were grossly inadequate. Education-related problems featured prominently together with unemployment, loneliness and boredom, separation from family and poor living conditions. Policy recommendations are made.
