Abstract: This book chapter is a contribution to a social psychological text. The contribution here is on small group process, involving face-to-face relationship which is an area that is often neglected in the study of group dynamics. It emphasises the fact that groups characterised by intimate face-to-face relationship are fundamental in forming the social nature and ideals of the individual. This when effectively handled will lead to a more harmonious society to live because the standards of conduct involving social norms would have been adequately internalised.
